Author's Note

"Why re-transcribe a parish register which has been available for almost forty years?" The answer is two-fold. Clerk hands from the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries are often difficult to read, and the author's training in paleography quickly pointed out more than four hundred mistranslations when comparing the earlier printing with photostats of the original.

More important than the mistranslations, however, were the intentional omissions. As Professor Charles Julian Bishko of the University of Virginia once remarked, "historians should refrain from making judgments about other times based upon their own set of moral values. Their responsibility is to record events in an objective manner."

The earlier transcribers wrote at one point in their 1966 publication

"p. 37 to 68/69 Baptism:: of Slaves is omitted as it would be of little genealogical help."

and again at the end of the publication they reminded the reader for a second time

"Note: Pages of entries containing baptisms of slaves only were omitted."

In examining the original sheets, the current transcriber was dismayed that not only had entire pages been left out, but oftentimes slave baptisms interspersed within the main text were omitted. In all, more than two thousand births and baptisms were missing! The genealogical value of such records are enormous, not only for black historians and genealogists seeking their own roots, but for scholars documenting the culture of slavery as it existed in colonial Virginia. For example, a baptismal pattern emerges from the slave pages. It would appear that the traditional date for bringing slaves to the church for baptism was the first Sunday in each month, unless a major feast day fell on that date. This pattern was evident from the very earliest recordings in the 1730s until the mid 1760s. Only in the spring of 1768 and occasionally thereafter were slave baptisms moved to the second Sunday of the month. The reason for this change is as yet unclear.

The ambivalent role of free blacks in Virginia society at this time is also evident in the parish listings. Occasionally, free-born black children were entered within the congregational portion of the parish record. This was particularly true in the earlier decades until the mid-eighteenth century. Beginning in the 1750s, however, they are generally included within the lists of slaves baptized within the parish. In all, the register records the baptism of fifty-seven free blacks. These have been collected as a group in the index for quick reference (See "Indexing Conventions," page 93).

The parish register was also a legal document. Act X of the early canons enacted between 1632 and 1649 required that a parish register, or a register of vital statistics be kept for every parish. This regulation continued in force until the church was disestablished in 1786.¹ Most of the slave entries were brief and perfunctory. However, a few owners took special care to record not only the baptism of their charges, but also their date of birth. Benjamin Waller, a prominent colonial slave owner as well as a member of the parish vestry, was one of the most diligent in this regard. He always provided both the birth date as well as the baptismal date of his slaves for the parish register. Another such owner was Colonel George Washington, whose slaves appear in the register twelve times, and each time the birth and baptismal date is noted.

For the genealogist in general, slave entries are a treasure trove of information on their own families. Not only do they record slave baptisms, but they can be used to date major events in an owner's and slave's life. References which change from "Belonging to" to "Belonging to the Estate of" or "Widow of" give valuable clues about chronology in an owner's life. Similarly, the record often denotes infant slave children as opposed to grown adults, and in most cases, the child's mother is recorded. For adult slaves, there are occasional references to the age of the person (e.g., "an ould Negro Woman").

The register is not merely a listing without comment on the births, baptisms, deaths, and burials within the church community. The pages depict a cross-section of society in the Williamsburg area at the time. For example, in a sampling of the period 1701 to 1703, seventy deaths occurred which were noted in the register. Included were forty-nine men and twenty-two women. Of the latter, nine women were cited as widows, ten as wives, and three as daughters. The men's list included a range of occupations and stations in life, from workmen to scholars:²:

The Parish

Bruton Parish was the consummation of nearly half a century of parish reorganization and frontier movement during the middle of the seventeenth century. In 1632 Middle Plantation was established with a parish of the same name. The new settlement lay on the boundary between Charles River (York) and James City counties. In 1644 the parish of Harop was created, comprising the lands between Archer's Hope Creek and Martin's Hundred. This new parish took in the Kingsmill plantation and that of Dr. John Pott, surgeon general of the Colony. Harop and Middle Plantation were united in 1658 and became Middletown (Middleton) parish.

To the north, settlement had become so widespread that a new county, New Kent (and its attendant parish), were created out of the northern portion of York county in 1654. The portion of York County above Queen's Creek not included in New Kent was made into a distinct parish and was called Marston. In 1674 Marston parish was joined to that of Middletown (Middleton), and the united group became known as "Bruton Parish". The new parish was named for the town of Bruton, Somerset, England, the ancestral home of the prominent Ludwell family³ and of the then governor, Sir William Berkeley. Today the parish embraces a portion of both York and James City counties and the city of Williamsburg.

Until 1678 there were three churches in the area, corresponding to the earlier Middle Plantation, Harop, and Marston Parishes, now stretching from York river to James River. There is clear evidence of at least two of these early wooden churches, one at the Indian fields near Queen's Creek (Marston), established before 1658, and the other at the Bruton Church site in Williamsburg. With the creation of the new parish in 1674 and the spread of the settlement from the immediate environs of Jamestown, the Vestry elected to erect a larger brick church at Williamsburg.

Much has appeared in print concerning the early days of Bruton Parish and of Bruton Church, which became the state church in 1699 when the seat of the colonial government was transferred from Jamestown to Williamsburg. Perhaps the best known and most nearly comprehensive publication is William A.R. Goodwin's the Record of Bruton Parish Church edited by Mary F. Goodwin, 1941, which contains historical data, transcriptions of early records, tombstone inscriptions, and other information. See also Historical Sketch of Bruton Church, Williamsburg, Virginia, by William A.R. Goodwin, 1903. No early vestry book survives, although there was one, 1674-1769, which existed until after the Civil War. Extensive extracts from it were included in a historical sketch by John C. McCabe, in American Church Review and Ecclesiastical Register, vol. VIII (January 1856).

The church of Bruton Parish which visitors to Williamsburg see today was finished about 1715 to replace the second Bruton Parish Church (also called the first brick church) which had been completed in 1683. The foundations of the first brick church were discovered and briefly unearthed beneath the present churchyard in 1938. There had been a church on the site as early as 1665.

The original contractor for the building of the second Bruton Parish Church was George Marable of James City. It was completed by a new contractor, Capt. Francis Page, following a disagreement and re-letting of the contract in 1681.⁴

The first brick church of 1683 was large enough for a rural parish, but with the establishment of the College of William and Mary in 1691 and the removal of the capital from Jamestown to Williamsburg in 1699, the church structure soon became too small once again.

Williamsburg Town, later the capital of the Virginia Colony, literally grew up around this tiny frontier parish church. Four hundred yards to the west, the College of William and Mary was founded in 1693. When fire destroyed the Jamestown statehouse in 1698, the burgesses decided to move the Virginia capital to Middle Plantation, soon renamed Williamsburg. The first legislature met in the new capital in 1704. By 1714 the Governor's Palace was completed just north of Bruton Church, and soon thereafter the Capitol Building at the end of Duke of Gloucester Street completed the early city triangle. It was clear by this time that the current parish church which had stood in the fields at Middle Plantation could no longer suffice for its newly-elevated role of primate church for the colonial capital.

In 1706 the vestry began raising funds for a new building, and in 1710 the vestry formally petitioned the Burgesses for financial assistance in building a new church "to accommodate the crowd of strangers brought together" by the

General Assembly. The following year, 1711, Governor Alexander Spotswood, an ardent architect, designed the third church for Bruton Parish himself. His "draught" of 1711, aided by an appropriation from the Assembly, led to completion of the present third and present church building in 1715.

A number of improvements were added to the structure and the interior during the colonial period. An organ was installed in 1755. The east end of the church was extended 22 feet in 1752 and the tower added in 1769. The latter addition caused much consternation among the press, who felt that it was the height of folly to spend such sums for a tower and the wooden steeple on the top. The churchyard wall—the same wall that encloses the churchyard today—dates from 1754.

The great heyday for Bruton Parish Church, as well as for Williamsburg itself, was the period from about 1715 to the mid 1770s. The church was attended by governors and their retainers, burgesses and their families, as well as many of the leading men in the colony who came to seek patronage or exercise power in the legislature. The church stood at the cultural apex of the Virginia colony, both figuratively and geographically. It was the focal point for the great controversies of the time, ranging from the heated feud between Robert Nicholas Carter and Rev. Samuel Henley in 1773 over the rectorship, to the church meeting of the now disbanded burgesses signaling the beginning of revolution the following year. Along with the leading lights were the merchant class, like John Chowning, tavern keeper, who with his wife Mary brought their son George to be baptized in 1761. And the lesser souls—plasterers, carpenters, blacksmiths, butchers, etc.—all were drawn to the church for their spiritual guidance. Sermons were sometime fiery and at other times intellectual—it depended upon the lecturer of the week. While the rectorship of the parish was customarily held by the president of the college, lecturers were often hired from the faculty to present sermons. One of the most popular was Rev. Mr. Josiah Johnson, master of the grammar school at the college. He gained a considerable following in his tenure as lecturer in the 1770s.

There was a formality within the church services that illustrated the structured nature of Virginia colonial society—men sat on the north side of the church and the women on the south. College youth watched the service from the gallery, and a special gallery for parish boys was provided after 1721. Distinguished families were permitted to erect pews or galleries with appropriate donations being tendered to the parish.

Bastard children were not neglected within the record. The parish clerk notes the baptism of Jane, bastard daughter of Elizabeth Maloney and the Speaker Moses;⁵ at another point the infant Sarah, bastard daughter of John Rowlinson and his housekeeper Elizabeth Garrett, is duly noted into the record. Mary Jones must have died giving birth to her bastard son William Good Jones on February 10, 1766, for the rector notes the mother as "Decd." (Deceased) in the parish record. Perhaps the most colorful entry in the register is the baptismal note for the two daughters of Elizabeth Reine for 1768. The entry speaks for itself:

Elizabeth & Anne Reine Alias Goodamore Bastard children by Elizabeth Reine alias Goodamore who came heare with him Disguised in man's clothing from portages. She says and ran away from her father. Her first daughter Elizabeth Born 8 Day of May 1768 and the second Daughter Ann Born October.

If the dates are correct, with but five months between births, one wonders about the viability of the second child.

Occasionally, a family would arrive at the clerk's office and have the entire family's birth record entered into the register. This was the case with David and Mary Morton who noted the birth dates of their four children on one visit in 1768..

The end of the colonial period also signaled the demise of the Anglican Church as a major institution. The American Revolution and its consequent separation of the church and State left the Bruton church in poverty. Williamsburg became a ghost town in the late 1770s. Lord Cornwallis occupied Williamsburg briefly just prior to the battle at Yorktown, and in July 1781 the Marquis de Lafayette liberated the town. The church building itself reputedly served as a storehouse or hospital, or perhaps both, during the final major battle of the Revolution at neighboring Yorktown, and in the succeeding decade it fell into serious disrepair as the state capital was moved from Williamsburg to Richmond in 1780. With fewer parishioners and less available funds, the church fell into physical deterioration. By the 1840s, the elegant eighteenth-century parish church lay in a state of disrepair and animals were grazed on its grounds. The five galleries in the interior were removed, along with the organ. The interior was subdivided to provide for a lecture room and Sunday School space. Only during the twentieth century and the advent of a large tourist industry to Colonial Williamsburg did the church recover some of its lost colonial glory. The visitor today must use his imagination to envisage the scene within the church during its colonial days - stone-flagged isles, whitewashed walls, oil painted mahogany seats- all bustling with a cross-section of Virginia colonial society.

Burials on the grounds.

Within the church itself, forty-two graves were identified during the 1905-1907 restoration. The more prominent are marked by stones in the floor. Many eighteenth century gravestones may be found in the churchyard. Since all the early stones were imported from England, many of the graves which entirely fill the grounds are unmarked. Some, like that of John Page (d. 1691/1692), who gave the land on which the church is built, were moved into the Tower for preservation during the restoration. Others include the table tomb of Governor Nott set up by order of the Assembly in 1720, the tall marble monument with an obelisk commemorating David Bray and his wife Judith (d. 1734) and the baroque tomb of Edward Barradall (d. 1743). In 1752 a brick wall was built by Samuel Spurr to enclose the graveyard, and this has survived to the present.

The parish register records 260 burials prior to 1700, but records for the seventeenth century are scarce and certainly many of the interment records have been lost. The oldest dated tombstone is that of Thomas Ludwell⁶ which reads:

The Register

Bruton Parish Register, 1662-1797, contains an incomplete record of baptisms and burials in this important parish during the colonial period. It is all that survives of an early parish register which has suffered much damage over the years. The current volume, which is preserved in the vault of the library of the College of William and Mary, was restored and rebound by the Williamsburg Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, in 1937. In 1957 a microfilm copy was made by the Research Department of Colonial Williamsburg Foundation.

The earliest vestry book of Bruton Parish (first entry dated 18 April 1674) survived until the mid-nineteenth century. At that time it was borrowed by Rev. John C. McCabe to use as reference material for a history of early churches in Virginia. The book was lost in a fire which destroyed Rev. McCabe's home. However, many copied vestry minutes were salvaged and published in the American Church Review and Ecclesiastical Register, Vol. VIII (1855-56).

The current manuscript exists today as loose sheets, with much of the edges missing. The pagination is confusing and is due to the addition of page numbers at a later date. Folio 54 (slave baptisms for 1763) brings confirmation that the sheet numbering was a much later addition to the manuscript. Sheet number 54 is badly eroded around the edges, and the number "54" is entered within the text of the second line where the words 'son of' or "daughter of" would normally have been placed. When preparing the document for microfilming, care was given to present the material in chronological fashion and in the two distinct portions of the journal which had survived. But clearly many sheets are missing from the current manuscript.

The manuscript's records begin some twelve years before Bruton Parish was established; the early years obviously belong to Marston Parish. The earliest records are those of deaths and burials, 1662-1761 (deaths 1762-1792 are missing).⁸ Included are baptisms, 1739-1797.⁹ Births and baptisms from 1662-1739 are missing; however, the photostatic volume contains twenty-four fragments, mainly corners of lost sheets, listing baptisms, 1671-1722. Photocopies of the original fragments are available only on the microfilm. Births and baptisms of slaves are recorded infrequently among the register with other baptisms up to 1747. At that time regular folios consisting solely of slave baptisms commences and continues until 1769. Slave records recommence for a brief time in 1782-1783 with one surviving sheet, verso and recto. Another sheet (fol. 68) contains sixteen slave baptisms spanning the years 1775 to 1797 enter in two distinct clerk's hands. No marriage records appear.

noted. In the recording of dates, almost all superscripts for the various days of the month are given as "th". Thus, the first of the month is "xxx 1th"; the superscripts "second" and "third" are written mostly as the above, but occasionally "xxx 2^d" is entered. Punctuation is almost non-existent. And capitalization generally follows the old German rule of capitalizing every noun.

Whenever a word or phrase seems illegible or nonsensical, the transcriber has entered "(?)" following the word or phrase. If it is clearly readable and still does not conform to a reasonable word, "(sic)" tells the reader that it is thus.

There are numerous marginal tick marks, in both pen and pencil, within the manuscript, probably the result of researchers' or clerks' notations over the centuries. For example, the entries for George Washington are prominently marked. The only marginal notations that have been preserved are the entries "pd." which denote that a fee was given for the service. These are almost always found within the slave sections of the register.¹⁰

And capitalization generally follows the old German rule of capitalizing every noun. ¹⁰

Whenever a word or phrase seems illegible or nonsensical, the transcription ¹¹ has entered it, often with the word or phrase, if it is any semblance to ¹⁰ it does not conform to a reasonable word, "(sic)" ¹¹ helps the reader that it is this ¹¹ ¹⁰

There are numerous marginal book marks, in ¹⁰ pen and pencil, within ¹¹ the manuscript, probably the result of researchers' ¹¹ clerks' notations over ¹⁰ centuries. For example, the entries for George Washington are prominent ¹⁰ marked. The only marginal notations that have been preserved are the ¹¹ ¹⁰ ¹¹ "pd." which denote that a fee was given for the service. These are almost ¹⁰ always found within the ¹¹ sections of the register.

SOME CONVENTIONS REGARDING THE INDEX:

- The names of freeborn African-Americans have been collected together and presented under three separate entries, as defined within the register itself: 1) Free Mulatta; 2) Free Negro; and 3) Freeborn. While no clear distinction is obvious, it was the compiler's view that there was some sort of distinction made by the clerk, and that these groupings should be kept.
- In instance where it was clear that the clerk had spelled a common family name phonetically, and thereby placed it far from the remainder of the family within the index, the decision was made to correct this spelling in the index only to allow for easier reference.
